

0143-1

CHOOSING AND USING TEXTBOOKS

Jacqueline Benevento, The School District of Philadelphia

Whenever foreign language teachers meet each other for the first time, the first words after "How do you do?" are usually "What textbook do you use?"

Since the selection of textbooks is so important to us, it might be expected that there would be many articles in our professional literature devoted to the topic of criteria for selection, but such is not the case. An examination of two leading American journals over the past five years revealed only a few articles dealing with overall textbook content, and there were no articles which proposed criteria for selection.

On the other hand, there were several articles that contained ideas which could be used to develop criteria, but only if a framework were available in which to fit the ideas. This article describes one possible framework.

When it comes time to select a new textbook at your school, you and your colleagues probably talk a lot about what you want and do not want, and examine as many different books as possible. You are also well advised to prepare a written set of criteria in advance, and match your findings of each book in writing against these criteria. You must then revise your criteria as you learn about new developments in foreign language education. Although you may share your opinions with your colleagues, if you do not put your criteria in written form, I would urge that you do so. In that way, you will be sure to evaluate all texts using the same measuring instrument.

Let us review briefly the things we do not like about the textbooks we have used, and then we will turn to the things we would like to see. Bear in mind that there is probably not one perfect textbook for everyone, but that there are books that are superior to others, given our individual requirements. After years of experience with various textbooks and accompanying materials, I know what I do not like, and I would imagine that your list is very similar to mine. Figure 1 summarizes these dislikes. As you consider this list, you will probably think of specific examples from your own experience.

Figure 1

TEXTBOOK DISLIKES

1. Too much material.
2. No identification of more important items.
3. Grammar explanations unrelated to core content.
4. Grammar drills with unrelated, uncontextualized items.
5. Unreal dialogues.
6. Unrelated drawings and photos.
7. Lack of communication practice.
8. Insufficient practice for important structures.
9. Lack of clarification between spoken language.
10. Workbook exercises that are repetitious, irrelevant, uncreative.

Perhaps what I have disliked most is being unable to get through a two-book series in two years; in having to take three or even four years. One journal article referred to this problem as "too much between the covers to cover."

I object to the presentation of large amounts of vocabulary and grammar in any one chapter, and to the lack of identification of those items which are more important than others.

Another peeve is the use of examples for the grammar explanations which are completely unrelated to the core content; the la plume de ma tante examples. Also passé are those textbooks with an emphasis on drills composed of items which do not hang together in one context.

I do not like acultural dialogues, obviously invented to present grammar points, where the characters are Pollyannas, where everything is bland and unreal, and where the setting is a neutral never-never land. I also object to photographs and illustrations, no matter how pretty, which have nothing to do with the printed content.

A textbook without many specific suggestions for student-to-student communication practice should be seriously reconsidered. It is not that we teachers are unable to create such activities; it is that we simply do not have time.

I am annoyed when I have to develop exercises for the practice of important structures that are insufficiently treated in the text, or to clarify which items belong to the spoken language and which to the written. Teachers should not have to re-write their textbooks to use them in the classroom.

As for workbooks, I have never liked those which repeat exactly the same material in the textbook or those which consist of fill-in-the-blank items which are not personalized or situationalized and which do not tap the creativity of students.

As I reviewed these dislikes and thought about what I would like to see in textbooks, three key words kept coming to mind: authenticity, communication, and integration. These were the same key concepts which I have used as working guidelines to write workbook materials. I found that they could also be used to develop criteria to select textbook materials.

The concepts of authenticity, communication, and integration are interrelated, but each one will be discussed separately for the purpose of analysis. We will direct our attention primarily to beginning and intermediate level textbooks. Figure 2 (see page 12) contains a framework for rating textbooks with criteria based in these three concepts.

Authenticity

First, consider the concept of authenticity. The claim is often made that the study of another people provides the most direct access to their culture. But for this claim to be valid, the culture and language presented must be authentic, and textbooks must be carefully examined in this light.

It is very important that the language presented in the textbook ring true — that the samples of spoken language be those actually used by natives in face-to-face communication and that the samples of written language be those which could appear in, or are adapted from, real written material such as letters, reports, newspapers, and magazines.

continued . . . Page 12

1986

0143-2

Choosing and Using Textbooks . . . from page 10

Figure 2
RATING SCALE FOR FOREIGN LANGUAGE TEXTBOOKS

	High	Mid	Low
Authenticity
Authentic spoken language samples
Authentic written language samples
Wide range of cultural topics
Typical cultural situations
Global awareness potential
Target language and culture in the world
Communication
Balance of practice in all four skills
Emphasis on use of language in realistic situations
Limited grammar and vocabulary
Language practice exercises situationalized and items contextualized
Range of meaningful activities
Open-ended questions
Integration
Relationship between language and culture clear
Communicative activities built in Systematic treatment of culture and communication as well as language
Equal weight to language, culture, and communication

spective is cross-cultural awareness. It is also claimed that the study of a foreign language fosters cross-cultural awareness. For this claim to be taken seriously, materials must specifically treat similarities and differences between the native and target cultures. In the past few years, there have been many improvements in textbooks regarding the authenticity of language and culture, but the cross-cultural awareness dimension is still not adequately treated.

Textbook exercises must also be authentic regarding participation of the student. It is assumed that one of the purposes of foreign language instruction is to prepare students to be travelers abroad. This is a distinct real-life possibility, and activities are needed which would cast students in authentic roles, activities in which they would be called on to show understanding of the target culture and contrast their own culture.

Communication

The second concept in the framework above is communication. In the past ten years or so, there have been many helpful journal articles and professional meetings dealing with classroom techniques which stress communication.

We have learned that mechanical pattern drills do not automatically lead to oral proficiency. We know that the classroom climate will be warmer and student attitude more positive when oral practice is personalized and meaningful. We have also become aware that if we claim to teach communication, we must allow students to talk more: researchers have found that foreign language teachers are not much different from others when it comes to giving students the opportunity to talk only one-third of the time. We also know that an emphasis on grammar rules is not effective in developing speaking ability. It is also important to recognize that communication involves all four skills of listening, speaking, reading, and writing.

Given this knowledge, textbooks should contain many exercises allowing for personalized, meaningful practice and for a balance of practice in all four skills. If communication is a goal claimed by textbook publishers, then they must provide appropriate practice in the form of realistic activities.

But saying merely that communication is important is not enough: we need to know what constitutes communication at various levels of proficiency. Until recently,

The cultural content must also be authentic and must reflect contemporary ways of life. There are textbooks on the market which contain lovely photographs in full color of pastoral scenes and folkloric festivals, but which ignore industrial and business aspects.

The situations in dialogues and readings must reflect those situations important in the various geographical areas where the language is spoken. For too long, textbooks ignored the many places in the world where the target languages were spoken. Several years ago, I used a French textbook with unrealistic dialogues set in a locale which could have been anywhere, except that Paris was specified and Textbook French was spoken.

The varied aspects of daily life in different social settings should be treated. The themes should range from those of the immediate environment, such as greetings and personal identification; through the activities of daily life, such as shopping and meals; significant events, such as career choices and vacations; and societal issues, such as education and ecology.

There exists no definitive set of cultural topics that should be included in foreign language textbooks. Colleagues in Indiana have developed a set of topics which could be treated in all foreign language courses, as shown in Figure 3. You might evaluate your own textbooks by determining to what degree they treat these topics. You may not require that every item be covered in your courses, but this comprehensive list can be very helpful.

The claim is also made that the study of a foreign language is necessary to the acquisition of a global perspective, but classroom materials must be specifically focused on a global awareness for this claim to be valid. The 1981 Northeast Conference Reports contained a rating scale for evaluating foreign language textbooks for global awareness content. This scale is reproduced in Figure 4. I would suggest that you measure your textbooks against this instrument, too. The results might surprise you.

One of the dimensions of a global per-

Figure 3
GENERIC CULTURAL CONTEXTS

Specific Cultural Situations

TRAVEL/TRANSPORTATION

- Long-Distance Travel
- Travel Within a Country
- Getting Around in the City
- Obtaining Lodging
- Introductions
- Food and Meals
- Getting Around in the Country
- Weather
- Famous Places to Visit
- Fantasy

LEISURE TIME

- Television
- Sports
- Expressing Preferences
- Sunday with the Family
- Attending a Special Event
- Bringing Back Souvenirs
- TV/Radio
- Popular Media
- Going to the Movies

THE WORLD OF
THE TARGET LANGUAGE

- Geography
- The Contemporary Scene
- A Specific Country
- Interdependence
- Contrastive Practices

MEETING PERSONAL NEEDS

- Shopping
- The Weather
- Using the Telephone
- Making Requests
- "Small Talk"
- Letters
- Obtaining Services or Help

SCHOOL AND EDUCATION

- The Daily Schedule
- Classroom Directions
- The School Plant
- Weekly Schedule of Classes

FINE ARTS

- Visual Arts
- Literature
- Famous Creative People
- Literary Themes or Values: Death, Love, Honor, Humor
- Drama
- Fairy Tales, Folklore, Children's Literature

FAMILY AND HOME

- Family Relationships
- Living Quarters
- Food and Meals
- Parties
- Entertaining
- Conveying Personal Information
- Birthday Observances

HISTORY AND POLITICS

- Major Events
- Historical Figures
- Governmental Organization
- Historical Periods
- Current Movements

WORLD OF WORK

- Professions
- Summer Employment

SOURCE: Indiana Department of Education and Office of School Programs, Indiana University, Advance Copy, October 1985.

such descriptions were not available, but the American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Languages (ACTFL) has now published a set of generic proficiency guidelines for the four skills and for culture. Parallel language-specific guidelines have been developed for French, German, and Spanish, and work is underway for Chinese, Japanese, and Russian. These guidelines can be used to estimate to what degree textbooks meet communicative goals.

However, statements of goals do not contain specifics for the selection of content. Having said that students need to be able to ask questions, for example, we need to know what topics they should ask questions about, in what situations, which structures they should use, and what vocabulary is needed. There are no definitive answers at present to these matters, nor is there one definitive inventory of language functions, but there are some helpful references available, a few of which are mentioned in the selected reading list below. They contain lists of functions, as well as many suggestions for communication practice.

Textbooks should strive to present situations which are typical of the everyday use of language and should clarify the functions expressed. They should limit the number of grammatical and lexical items, presenting only those which are relevant and appropriate. Items should be included based on such things as usefulness to students, frequency of occurrence in the culture, generalizability to other situations, and relative degree of simplicity.

When examining textbooks, look for exercises to practice grammar and vocabulary which set forth realistic situations and in which all items are contextualized within those situations. Look for open-ended questions about content as well as those requiring specific information.

Look for a large number of speaking exercises which direct students to talk with each other about classroom transactions, their personal opinions, and their lives outside the classroom; activities in which students pretend that they are in other situations; and role-playing in which both situations and roles are imaginary. Look for writing exercises which are meaningful and which tap student creativity, such as letters to pen pals, reports of interviews, and personalized paragraph writing.

Figure 4

GLOBAL POTENTIAL RATING SCALE

Material: _____

Will this material help the student . . .

	High potential			Low potential
	5	4	3	2	1
1 Learn accurate information about another culture?	5	4	3	2	1
2 Decrease egocentric perceptions?	5	4	3	2	1
3 Decrease ethnocentric perceptions?	5	4	3	2	1
4 Decrease stereotypic perceptions?	5	4	3	2	1
5 Increase the student's ability to empathize?	5	4	3	2	1
6 Develop constructive attitudes toward diversity?	5	4	3	2	1
7 Develop constructive attitudes toward change?	5	4	3	2	1
8 Develop constructive attitudes toward ambiguity?	5	4	3	2	1
9 Develop constructive attitudes toward conflict?	5	4	3	2	1

SOURCE: Lowe, H.Z., Bragaw, D.H. and Wooster, J.S., "Global Responsibility: The Role of the Foreign Language Teacher" in Foreign Languages and International Studies: Toward Cooperation and Integration. T.H. Geno (ed.), 1981 Northeast Conference Reports (Middlebury, VT: The Conference, 1981), 65.

Choosing Textbooks . . . from page 13

Communication activities should be interspersed throughout a chapter, not added on at the end as optional. Workbook exercises should be truly complementary, reinforcing the language and culture learnings of the textbook, but varying the situations and activities. Recordings should contain listening comprehension material not found in print that is also complementary, not merely supplementary.

Integration

The third and last concept in the framework above is integration. The 1983 Annual Edition of the NEA publication Today's Education, in a section about foreign languages, pointed out a difference between good and bad textbooks. The authors stated that good textbooks integrate their presentation of the language with descriptions of the culture that goes with it, and that separating them is like studying the Renaissance without mentioning art, or vice versa. They said that the worst texts are those that separate culture from language and those that leave communicative activities up to the teacher, instead of building them into the text.

In 1980, a group of foreign language education experts were convened by ACTFL in Boston to discuss priorities for the profession. Those experts charged with the priority area of curriculum and materials identified three necessary components of a foreign language program: a linguistic component, a cultural component, and a communicative component (Stern, 1983). Most textbooks up to the present have treated only the linguistic component systematically. What is needed is a systematic treatment also of culture and communication, with equal weighting given to all three components.

A textbook must make clear the relationship between language and culture to be selected. A textbook which keeps cultural information isolated should be rejected. A textbook which does not emphasize the use of language for communication should not be adopted. In summary, for a foreign language textbook to get high marks, authentic language must be integrated into authentic cultural contexts with the focus on communication.

SELECTED READINGS

- American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Languages. ACTFL Provisional Proficiency Guidelines. Hastings-on-Hudson, NY: ACTFL Materials Center, n.d.
- Bragaw, Donald H., Helene Z. Loew, and Judith S. Wooster. "Global Responsibility: The Role of the Foreign Language Teacher." In Foreign Languages and International Studies: Toward Cooperation and Integration. 1981 Northeast Conference Reports, pp. 47-89. Edited by Thomas H. Geno. Middlebury, VT:

- The Conference, 1981.
- Gradisnik, Anthony et al. "High School Foreign Language Texts: Too Much Between Covers to Cover." Foreign Language Annals 11 (Dec. 1978): 551-57.
- Guntermann, Gail and June K. Phillips. Functional-Notional Concepts: Adapting the Textbook. Language in Education: Theory and Practice 44. Washington, D.C., 1982.
- Harlow, Linda L. "An Alternative to Structure-Oriented Textbooks." Foreign Language Annals 11 (Dec. 1978): 559-63.
- Lange, Dale L., ed. Proceedings of the National Conference on Professional Priorities. Boston, American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Languages, November 1980, pp. 12-34. Hastings-on-Hudson, NY: ACTFL Materials Center, 1980.
- McKay, Sandra Lee. "On Notional Syllabuses." Modern Language Journal 64 (Summer 1980): 179-86.
- Moskowitz, Gertrude. "Effects of Humanistic Techniques on Attitude, Cohesiveness, and Self-Concept of Foreign Language Students." Modern Language Journal 65 (Summer 1981): 149-57.
- Quisenberry, James D. "Some Characteristics of Effective Practice in Second Language Acquisition." Foreign Language Annals 15 (Feb. 1982): 47-51.
- Stern, H.H. "Toward a Multidimensional Foreign Language Curriculum." In Foreign Languages: Key Links in the Chain of Learning. 1983 Northeast Conference Reports, pp. 120-46. Edited by Robert G. Mead, Jr. Middlebury, VT: The Conference, 1983.
- Valdman, Albert and Helen P. Warriner-Burke. "Major Surgery Due: Redesigning the Syllabus and Texts." Foreign Language Annals 13 (Sept. 1980): 261-70.

GRADUATE STUDY IN TRANSLATION

FRENCH
GERMAN
SPANISH

CITY UNIVERSITY
GRADUATE SCHOOL

The Graduate School of The City University of New York offers a specialization in Translation, leading to the Master of Arts degree in Liberal Studies. Students combine advanced work in French, German, or Spanish with courses in other, non-language areas in the Graduate School's 30 disciplines. Graduates are prepared for careers in government, business and industry, and other international organizations. Training in translation is also of interest to foreign language teachers, for it offers excellent opportunities for high-level, sophisticated language work.

For more information, contact:
Professor Renée Waldinger,
Executive Officer, Master of Arts in Liberal Studies Program, CUNY
Graduate School, 33 West 42
Street, New York, N.Y. 10036; (212)
790-4497.

SPANISH IN MEXICO

Home of the LORD TWIG METHOD

More than just another language course,
It's an experience you'll never forget.

The LORD TWIG METHOD programs your subconscious through association of ideas enabling you to learn far faster and speak and "think in Spanish" without translating from English.

4 hrs. daily - $ 325.00 dlls/mth in group of 4
4 hrs. daily - $ 365 dlls/mth in private class

Homestay in Guadalajara with a carefully selected Mexican family (Room and Board)
$ 250.00 monthly.

Instituto Mexicano de Cultura Internacional
Av. Chapultepec 444 Av. Fco. Villa 424
Guadalajara, Jalisco Puerto Vallarta, Jal.
44100 MEXICO 48330 MEXICO
Tel: 16 66 36 Tel: 2 38 50